To this day, Duke was one of the most exciting and mysterious clubs in the nation. Everyone knew what they were. They were not. Not only was Duke a powerhouse in sports (men's basketball and football), its basketball team played in the national championship game in 1980 and reached the Final Four in 1987 and 2003. But the truth is Duke was many things. It was not, however, a varsity school. The club was still a part of the academic curriculum, but for many students it was a perfunctory subject. A student named Phyllis Jones was a member of the club and the only indication that she was a part of the university was her Duke ID card. She had earned a law degree and worked as an assistant attorney general. That changed one day in January of 1983 when a young Duke football player named Dave Waddell walked into her law office. Waddell had had an athletic career at Duke, but he said he wasn't a very good football player. "We were having a discussion and he said, 'What are you doing here,'" Jones recalled. "I said, 'I'm a lawyer and I'm here to talk to you about football.' He said, 'I don't know a thing about football.'" Jones recalled that she asked the player to take out his ID card and show it to her. It was the "coolest thing." "He had a Duke ID card," she said. "That's when I said, 'We're a school.'" Sure enough, he was. When he asked who the school's president was, Jones said he asked her. "I said, 'You're the president.'" The two began talking and Waddell told Jones that he had been recruited by several big-name schools, including North Carolina, Kentucky and UCLA. He was planning on applying for the UCLA athletic department and the only reason he wanted to go was because he had his name on it. That was unacceptable to Jones, who hired a lawyer to represent him. She said the Duke athletic department was told to transfer him to another school, but instead they stuck him in a basement and called him a "

FILE PHOTO: The logo of Swiss bank UBS is seen in front of the company's office building in Zurich, Switzerland January 29, 2016. REUTERS/Arnd Wiegmann/File Photo ZURICH (Reuters) - UBS UBSG.S is considering a sale of its digital banking unit, said people familiar with the matter. UBS UBSG.S is looking to sell the business and is planning to make a formal approach to other potential buyers, the people said. The unit, which accounts for about 35 percent of the Swiss bank's income, was created in 2015 after UBS split its retail banking operations. UBS's UBSG.S digital banking division reported a drop in first-half net income on Tuesday. [nCj67v7k8] UBS has received interest from other banks, including from HSBC HSBA.L, sources have said. The sources also said that French bank Societe Generale SA SGEN.PA is interested in buying an equity stake. UBS has already hired a number of bankers to manage the process, which would allow it to get rid of its unwanted bank after years of adapting its business model to meet new regulatory requirements. "The (digital banking) business is highly attractive, it's growing in all regions, and there is a very high demand for it," said one of the sources. It is unclear whether the potential sale would involve a full sale, or whether it would involve a partial sale that would keep the brand of the bank's UBS Bank. Representatives from UBS and HSBC and SocGen declined to comment. UBS has said that it would seek a "favorable outcome" for its unit and that it remains in talks with different parties.For the past couple of years the guys here have really embraced the Dabr name.
