To achieve this, I've used a UIView subclass, that is a subclass of UIView. The only view I'm adding to the view hierarchy is a UIView subclass that has a UIPanGestureRecognizer. The reason is because it is much easier to use UIPanGestureRecognizer's delegate to receive the touch location and move the view by translation. The problem is that the view will have some view controller as the superview of the view (UIView). I'm not sure what the best solution would be for this. Is there a better way to get this done? A: CGRect frame = view.frame; view.frame = CGRectOffset(frame, movement.x, movement.y); And that's it. In fact, that's the whole thing. (Maybe someone could make a nice utility method to do this that would make it so you could leave out the variable declarations and the code would just work. Maybe something like "move view to coordinate x,y and frame center if needed" and then it would handle the "frame center if needed" case for you?) 2020 Tickets Are On

USA Photo Maps is a small Windows application designed to help users grab USGS (United States Geodetic Survey) aerial photos, save them to the computer, and create GPS maps. It sports a clean interface that gives users the possibility to download maps by specifying a name for the map and providing information about the latitude and longitude coordinates. What's more, the program is able to import data from XML, HST, TCX, or GPX, and you can print the maps. USA Photo Maps gives users the possibility to select the map type (black and white, coloured areas, or topographical maps), adjust the level of brightness, activate the UTM grid, and insert waypoints. Other important features worth mentioning allow users to go to the specified address and populated places, view the location set by the specified latitude and longitude, as well as zoom in or out of the map, and create routes.
